It can be easily installed in minutes, and requires no programming. Beef: Meat, Meat Products, Meat By-products, or Meat Products. Beef is red, and is a domesticated, quadruped, herbivorous ruminant. Beef production has expanded substantially throughout the last century, and beef is produced from a number of animals that are both commercially and traditionally raised. There are two principal classes of beef cattle in the United States: cattle reared for beef, or forage-fed beef, and cattle reared for dairy. Meat-type beef are produced primarily from cattle that have been fattened for slaughter, while dairy cattle are produced primarily from cows that have been bred to produce milk. Beef cattle in the United States are also divided into two general classes, beef steers and beef heifers. Beef steers are cattle between one year and two years of age, and beef heifers are cattle between two years and three years of age. Beef heifers are a higher value class of cattle because of the shorter time period needed to reach market weight, but the price difference is more than the cost difference. Beef cattle are raised primarily for slaughter; each animal is slaughtered when it reaches market weight. There are two principal methods of slaughter: the captive bolt stun method and the Halal slaughter method. In the captive bolt stun method, the cattle are anesthetized with a combination of inhalant gas and intravenous (IV) medication, then the head is held in a contracted position, allowing an electronic controlled firearm to deliver a captive bolt to the head. In the Halal slaughter method, the cattle are given anesthetization, have their throats cut and their jugular veins severed, and are then allowed to bleed to death. While beef is primarily produced for slaughter, there are a number of other uses for beef as well, including human consumption, milk production, and as food for other animals. In the early 1900s, the U.S. government began the first production of commercially viable quantities of beef using cattle grown specifically for beef. The origin of the word beef is unclear. Some believe that it comes from the French word bœuf, while others believe it derives from the Old English word for "ox". Others believe that it comes from the Latin word for "bull" because of the importance of cattle to the Roman Empire. Beef and Beef Products Beef is red 82157476af
